To report a novel approach for reducing radiation dose in CT imaging with early-access angiography. Radiation dose in the setting of early-access angiography is reduced by a mean of 20% using a novel imaging paradigm. Following a conventional coronary angiogram, either contrast-enhanced or unenhanced, the radiologist can conduct a 2-second window of maximum-intensity projections (minIP) of the right and left ventricles and left atrium. For the purposes of this study, only the minIP images were interpreted. This technique reduces radiation dose compared with prior studies, as the optimized parameters (600-750 ms gantry rotation, 35-40% radiation collimation, iterative reconstruction level 6) can be used over a shorter period of time (2-2.5 seconds). The new protocol allowed all cardiac, nonmyocardial, and free-floating structures and calcifications to be assessed, thus reducing the need for additional unenhanced scans. Radiation dose can be substantially reduced by utilizing a novel "X-ray tracking" protocol. Further optimization of the protocol and collection of additional data will be needed to determine the true efficacy and long-term
