There are health, ethical, and economical reasons why using a conventional laboratory mouse cage cannot be justified. The new cage designs for laboratory rodents that we have been developing over the past few years address these issues. There are 8 major physical design features of the cages: (i) unventilated, stacked caging (ii) wire flooring (iii) solid bottom (iv) drain holes (v) plastic lid (vi) smaller cages (vii) cage positions (viii) smaller numbers of animals per cage. We have been using this system on our laboratory rodents for 2 years. Animals in the new cage design show very little fighting and only minimal cannibalism. Over the longer term, it is beginning to have the effect we predicted it would have; the wire bottom and solid bottom design are restricting fighting because of this new type of cage. The purpose of this study was to examine the effect of the new cage design on: (i) fighting (ii) aggression (iii) stress (iv) cannibalism (v) weight gain (vi) aggression (vii) body weight, (viii) life expectancy. One hundred twenty-five mice were assigned to either the conventional polycarbonate cages (Stappen) or to the new design of caging (Stappen B). Males of one strain and females of a second strain were used in this study. Fighting was measured by recording the number of fights between cage-mates over a period of 10 days. Aggression was measured by weighing the mice at the end of the experiment and using the time-out criterion (threshold: 20%). Stress and cannibalism were measured by weighing the food and feces in the new cage design and by finding their carcasses at the end of the study. Body weight was measured at the beginning and the
