This program lets you play random sounds every time an event occurs. As long as you keep the program running, it continues to work. Just give it an event and it will play sounds to simulate an event occurring. The user can choose between a normal playing and a fast playing mode. Well you can always use winex and wine or download a program like sound convert and let the wine all play for you. Or use an easy VLC player to view the sounds or just download a simple audio player and start playing the sounds. From the subject of the OP I can assure you that this is not a virus or a trojan horse. Though it is worthwhile to mention, as the OP said, he wrote the program. This program is legit. This program can play sounds like natural object, car, knocking, gunshot, monster, ticking clock, etc. Random Sound Board is created by professional sound producers. Random Sound Board can play many kinds of sounds. 1) You have to install Java Runtime Environment (not the Java JRE 1.2

or 1.3) to run this application. 2) You have to download the Java Class Library (Sun's) or Java Runtime Environment (Or Linux compatible version of JRE from Sun) from Unzip it under your hard disk and after installation, you can run this application by using the command: java -classpath D:\sounds.jar random.RandomSoundBoard SAKARIN (a.k.a. rege) is a daemon application that runs in the background and plays audio files that are named with the 'random' suffix. It plays audio files using the OS built-in sounds mixer or through PulseAudio or ALSA. Every second it reads the current time and selects a random audio file, and plays it. "The setting of the actual playing time can be controlled through the command-line arguments. The default is 5 seconds. Radiobot is a simple Radiobot for Asterisk that will play sounds when his control word is spoken, along with a synthesized voice. There are two "voices", Robot Tone and Robot Voice, each of which is configurable in the config file (see below). I'm happy to include a Debian package, if someone should like to submit their translations of the texts.
