One idea I like to explain is 'Self-correction'. I found that for the 2 years I taught, students were forgiven for being scared of Photoshop and all the noise around it. At times, they would be confused and ask big questions or sometimes use someone else's work to try out their ideas. So, the idea of a mentor or expert is to stop you making those type of mistakes, so be prepared for me to jump in the way 'young' students might jump in with their question. I remember when I first starting teaching Photoshop I used to be scared of some of the more complex topics. Since then, I have been asked to teach at a number of universities, so I expect I will be speaking about this topic a lot more. But, I try to explain that most people get comfortable with things from using them day in day out and having that guide to help resolve issues and review work. Don't feel bad if you are scared to give it a go. I remember being scared the first time I went out of the house and rode a bicycle. Don't forget that we all started somewhere and with practise, you will feel more confident and comfortable with yourself. In fact, you can expect me to nag you about growing a beard! the best editor of paint brush and brushes.
