Let's get it out of the way. I don't like either version of Lightroom. To be more precise, I don't like how it works. I have yet to find a way to make it simpler or easier to use. I tried; I honestly did. I believe the longer I use and use it, the worse it gets. I don't want to spend much more time on this one because I don't like how it is right now and because it probably would only make me want to use it even less. It's just not good. I expect that to remain the case. Lightroom 5 is just not good right now, The new version of Adobe Photoshop is not so different. The biggest difference is that it seems to have been updated to give the Apple Pencil some much needed functionality, as it now works on the latest version of Adobe's app. As always, the most important new feature is the new Content-Aware Fill. Originally, this was an advanced HDR feature that enabled you to combine images of an event or a location to create more natural-looking mixed photos. It essentially was a fancy substitute to using an artificial white balance adjustment. Colors that change between the shots it sifts through are merely replaced with other similar colors in the image. It tries to track shifts in skin tone between images. The adjustments are applied non-destructively and are easy to remove with a few clicks. Of course, Adobe now offers the same thing for the entire image set. This time around, they are calling it Content-Aware Fill. The old HDR feature was fine and probably better because it let you practice. This new one probably will not be as effective for that reason. It will arguably work better, though, for other scenarios. I think it has to do with the way it combines images. It will combine RAW images, if you want it to. The adjustment is applied very gracefully, so I'm not sure why Adobe didn't just call it
