If you are already used to 3D functionality in other apps, like Sony Vegas, this new tool about to debut in Adobe Photoshop will give you an even more powerful offering. Try the new trim and crop tools. Adobe will no doubt continue to push the envelope creatively and offer added enhancements to their users. The combination of AI edits, tools and library features provides a very complete editing experience, with the backup for Photoshop being the ability to export into other platforms or editing apps. With the new features included in the update, you no longer will need to pay for 6 extensions if you like to make face composites or retouch. Sorting, hiding of content you've already created and an AI photo fix are just a couple of highlights of the new features. The last few versions of Photoshop have been just better and better. It does a great job on editing RAW files. However, I have been testing the new iPad Pro with its Pencil in Photoshop for a while now. It's amazing!

It's a really powerful tool for working with images. When you get the app through the app store it actually works like a "Universal" app. That means while I'm developing I'm using the app in portrait mode and when I go to send the app to a client the app automatically opens and presents me with the app on an iPad (as if I was on an actual device). It's a very smooth and fluid experience. When I'm ready to send it to a client I'm asked if I want to send my files in this format and it creates the universal app for all devices. The app also creates a thread for notes for me without me having to open another app. It creates a thread in the Photos app as well. Finally, the universal app exposes now native photo editing options. The new pen tool (new since forever) is better than 2D. It's easy to use with a dumb curve and not using any post-processing filters. I'm really happy with the new pen tool in the new universal app. I just wish it was in the older version as well.
