With AAA games, where lighting-technique designers can easily pace themselves and finish a scene in less than an hour, the lighting-effects industry has to come up with ways to add as many lights, effects, and other elements to a scene as possible in real-time and deliver them as fast as possible. On the gaming side, streaming-and-real-time rendering of images and video (think Gears of War running on a non-gaming-console target, or Unreal Engine in a Unity game) makes the potential for smart lighting significantly higher,
