Privacy advocates are going to be curious about this. So far, I cannot find any sign that Adobe is storing any of your monitor ID or some other unique identifier in any of the new system's data that would identify you to Adobe in this way. I'd be shocked if that happens, but I'm going to read the fine print to make sure. Welcome back to Adobe Photoshop, the world's most popular image editing software company. Before we start, you should be sitting down and reading the Privacy and Cookie Policy, as well as the new Terms of Use agreement (at least the new TOU as of this review. Older Terms of Use agreements used to be much more back-and-forth with Adobe about any of these things, so you may have noticed a lack of changes in these areas in the past.) These three items indeed affect you. At least, not until you click the accept button. Until they are accepted from Adobe, they are unenforceable, and your stated acceptance of the terms of use is probably not enough to bind you to them. For instance, you can make any changes you want to any part of the agreement. With the new activation system, you now'll be able to buy things other than products from Adobe. If you happen to be a CS6 customer, you'll be able to buy any of the product updates, as well as any add-ons, apps, and services offered by Creative Cloud or its partners. The pricing structures for these components are probably based on your previous pricing, with a slight tweak for a new product, plus the new subscription features. Adobe suggests monthly payments at this time, and you can pay with gift cards from Amazon, eGiftcards from Visa, and Apple Gift Cards using your Apple Account. Apple Pay on the Mac seems only to be in beta, with Adobe earlier this year demonstrating the functionality to representatives of the press .
