Unfortunately, the Photoshop App is not optimized for the iPad Pro yet. While it has some nice features, such as the ability to wipe your canvas and go back to the previous position before getting bored with it, the lack of zoom support is a huge letdown. I just don't have any use for that feature and I believe that it is absolutely essential for photo editing. Adobe is supposedly working on a future update that will have a lot of improvements. Some of them may come in the next version. Some others may come in a later version. We just have to wait and see. This is a huge business and the future is going to be all about digital content. Interestingly, there is a lot about working with software in the kitchen. Photo editing is an important part of that equation, along with video format conversion and including rights management options in strategic formats such as FLAC. We only need to wait until Adobe will have time to release a product that is really ready to compete with Lightroom since it is an essential component for any modern workflow. Adobe has some good (and not so good) news. The good news is that you can use the Lightroom export feature in Photoshop Sketch, which offers some nice tools. However, I may still choose Photoshop with a little bit of love. I don't need an even better editor than the one I already enjoy working with. I just wanted an iPad Pro that can handle all of my digital work without any problems. That should be a possible solution. Upsides and downsides are still the same. If Adobe will release a re-optimized version of the Photoshop App, more features will make this incredible tablet even better. If it releases the same version of the App with a couple of minor changes or even just improvements, it will probably be awesome, too. The new features such as a much improved performance and a more robust workflow tool will make Photoshop Sketch that much more appealing.
