Adobe Lightroom 5 has a new, new "Create a New Catalog" feature that lets you create a new catalog or folder for future projects. It's a welcome addition, saving typing and simplifying file selection, though I wish it allowed you to re-use your current catalog or folder. Other additions include new support for DNG and RAW file formats like ProRes 422 (HQ), 1080p, and 4K ProRes. For RAW images, you can also now edit and choose whether to view the RAW file or its embedded DNG file in Lightroom 5. This is great for multipage projects, as you'll be able to see your entire project from history, as well as any changes made to the individual DNG files in the same window. Lightroom 5 is focused on the big picture. It's stronger in areas it was always considered a "power in a small package." That includes the new, new version of Image Merge. Features like Split Toning (a popular look for black-and-white images) are now branded as part of the Photoshop family of features, allowing easy access to new photoshop features such as spot healing as well as more accurate color placements. And of course, there are some of the familiar features like the non-destructive changes made to the raw pixels of your image, new brush tools and brushes, masking tools, layer styles, and much more. There are a bunch of new features and improvements in this release as well, not the least of which is the ability to import and edit JPEG files directly from a camera camera and the newly implemented Auto Content-Aware Scale technology, which makes your project fit to whatever your device can handle. However, everything related to the user interface is still a work in progress. Many tasks from the default interface, such as cropping, duplicate image removal, and layer masking, still require a bit of time to get used to. Also, to see pixel-level adjustments in a preview window, you have to go to the Develop module and back.

We will be continuing to work with the Photoshop team on this delivery.
