The European Commission has said that there are no known alternatives to deal with "water scarcity and climate change" and that the bloc has a unique responsibility to play its part in a world that is being reshaped by technology. The European Commission has said that there are no known alternatives to deal with "water scarcity and climate change" and that the bloc has a unique responsibility to play its part in a world that is being reshaped by technology. "The global challenge of climate change and the resulting water stress affect Europe as much or even more than other continents, as they are closely intertwined," said the Commission. "The EU as a world-leading supplier of freshwater resources has a unique responsibility to play its part in a world that is being reshaped by technology," it said. "Reducing our own domestic use must always be the first priority, but the EU also has a responsibility to assist other regions in this respect, particularly in
