Discontinuation of long-term hydralazine therapy in patients with systemic lupus erythematosus. The objective of this study was to evaluate the safety, efficacy and therapeutic index of the long-term use of hydralazine in patients with systemic lupus erythematosus (SLE). Twenty-nine patients with SLE were enrolled in a retrospective trial of oral hydralazine therapy (mean total daily dose, 50 mg; mean duration of therapy, 3.8 +/- 0.6 years). The clinical and laboratory data were compared between the hydroxychloroquine-treated period (median, 1.0 year) and the hydralazine-treated period (median, 9.8 years). Seven patients were withdrawn from the hydroxychloroquine period and 17 were withdrawn from the hydralazine period. Thirteen of the 17 patients withdrew because of adverse effects, and 4 patients withdrew due to an inability to tolerate the drug. One patient withdrew due to death after a car accident. The mean levels of serum protein and albumin in the hydralazine period (6.0 +/- 1.1 g/dl) were significantly lower than those in the hydroxychloroquine period (7.4 +/- 0.9 g/dl). The mean values of urea nitrogen, creatinine, and C3 and C4 in the hydralazine period were significantly higher than those in the hydroxychloroquine period. None of the 14 patients with lupus nephritis had significant increases in serum creatinine. Nine of the patients had a decrease in their symptoms, and 5 of these patients had an improvement of skin lesions. These results suggest that long-term hydralazine therapy was effective in the treatment of SLE. In addition, oral hydralazine therapy was generally well tolerated in patients with SLE.
