I have a really simple solution with just C# and F# projects. The C# project does some things and provides a Dll for a 3rd party API. The Dll is then imported by the F# project. When the Dll is being updated, the F# project needs to be rebuilt. The only way I can trigger a rebuild at the moment is to go into the C# project and click Debug -> Start without debugging. This rebuilds the C# project and then the F# project (and re-compiles itself). I would like to automate this, such that if the C# project does updates to the Dll, the F# project gets rebuilt. How do I trigger this build from the C# project? A: You can do that by using F#'s built-in support for projects. But I find myself really weak on how to use this. This code shows how to use a DLL with a project and some tests to run on it. open System.IO open System.Reflection open System.Reflection.Assembly open System.Runtime.InteropServices // Display an assembly name let assembly =
